Hi Jane,

Thank you for sharing your draft and comments. It is a ton of information; you are doing a great job pulling it all together.

I noticed that a lot of the studies you mention in your draft were captured in my systematic search for the POE MOA (noncancer) section. I wanted to share with you a draft table on these studies that I anticipate will ultimately reside in an Appendix.

I also shared a 2-pager introducing the approach I have taken, which will likely serve as the intro to the POE noncancer MOA section.

I am also making a summary table that will go in the main text- it analyzes the evidence for each mechanistic event across studies in a single row. I am also drafting two summary diagrams (one based on the more informative data, and one including both the more and less informative data). These materials are too rough to share at this point.

I realize this would have been nice information for you to have while you were writing your draft, but I suppose that is one of the difficulties of working in parallel on these assessments. If it is too late to be useful, I understand, I just thought I would share.

Please do not take any time away from working on your section to review my draft analysis. Rather, I am sharing this in case it may prove useful to you as you work to revise your section, or if we want to begin to think about the need for a future discussion on coordination/ approaches across our sections, and possibly other related sections.

Thanks again,
Andrew

Dear all,

You were asked to provide comments to Jason on the formaldehyde materials for the meeting on Thursday. It would save me time if you also provided them to me as well. It will help me in the revision of the materials as well as preparing to address questions and take into account insights you may have. This would not take the place of providing Jason with comments to help him collate and develop a group response.

Thanks!

Jane Caldwell

Dear All,

I thought it would help us move forward to provide some feedback on the comments I heard last week and it would save us some time when we continue the discussion this week and help us move forward. Please see attached.
